

As the safety chair for the USAirways Washington based flight attendants in Washington, D.C., I am opposed to passengers using their cellphones during any phase of our flights. The cell phones could be used for any sort of reason, not least of which, someone, such as a terrorist, could be communicating with others seated elsewhere on the aircraft to coordinated their movements. In addition, there is not any hard evidence that cell phones don't interfere with the navigational instruments. Since becoming ever vigilant on the aircraft over the past few years, this would increase the possibility of compromising our ability to maintain a safe and secure cabin environment.
